A Chance Encounter

In the summer of 1832, the Yellowstone Association was on a trading mission when they encountered a large war party of Absaroka warriors.

The Absaroka were a fierce and powerful tribe, and their intentions were far from friendly.

Despite being outnumbered, the mountain men decided to stand their ground. They knew that retreat would only lead to certain death, so they took up positions behind rocks and trees and prepared for a fight.

Ambushed in the Mountains

As the Absaroka warriors charged, the mountain men opened fire. The battle raged for hours, with both sides suffering heavy casualties. But the mountain men's superior firearms gave them an advantage.

At one point during the battle, one of the mountain men named Hans Kleppinger was badly wounded. His companions refused to abandon him, and they fought off the Absaroka warriors until nightfall.

A Night of Terror

As darkness fell, the mountain men knew they had to escape. They gathered their wounded and their belongings and retreated into the mountains. But the Absaroka warriors were still hot on their trail.

The mountain men spent the night hiding in a cave, their wounds throbbing and their supplies dwindling. They knew that if they could not find a way out soon, they would be doomed.

A Narrow Escape

As the first rays of dawn broke, the mountain men emerged from their hiding place and cautiously made their way through the mountains. They were weak and exhausted, but they were determined to survive.

After days of wandering, they finally stumbled upon a group of friendly Native Americans who helped them heal their wounds and provided them with food and supplies. The mountain men were finally able to return to civilization, but they would never forget the harrowing experience they had endured in the Absaroka Mountains.
