A Legacy of Suffering

Established in February 1864, Andersonville was designed to hold Union soldiers captured by Confederate forces. Over the course of its 14-month existence, the camp housed over 45,000 prisoners, with an estimated 13,000 dying due to disease, starvation, and mistreatment.

Conditions within the camp were deplorable. Prisoners were crammed into overcrowded barracks, sleeping on the bare ground. Sanitation was almost non-existent, leading to widespread outbreaks of disease. Food was scarce and often spoiled, and prisoners were subjected to brutal punishments for even minor infractions.

Prisoner Resilience

Despite the horrific conditions they endured, the prisoners of Andersonville demonstrated remarkable resilience and strength. They formed secret societies to support each other, organized religious services, and even established a makeshift hospital to care for the sick and wounded.

One of the most enduring symbols of prisoner resilience is the Andersonville Cemetery, where the remains of over 13,000 Union soldiers are buried. The cemetery is a solemn and moving tribute to the sacrifice and endurance of those who perished at Andersonville.

Preserving the Legacy

In 1970, Andersonville prison camp was declared a National Historic Site. The site is managed by the National Park Service, which has worked to preserve the camp's historic structures and landmarks.

Today, Andersonville serves as a place of remembrance and education. Visitors can explore the camp grounds, visit the museum, and attend educational programs. The site also hosts annual events, such as a memorial service and a candlelight vigil, to honor the memory of the prisoners and their families.
